Image 2 (Pexels):

Summary:

For nearly two decades, computer models said stronger westerly winds and more greenhouse gases in the atmosphere would pump more carbon-rich deep water up towards the Southern Ocean's surface, which would release carbon dioxide into the air. Yet new data has found the exact opposite has happened

Detailed analysis:

The article highlights a critical discrepancy between climate model projections and observed oceanic carbon dynamics, underscoring the need for revised parameterizations in Earth system models. For UPSC and other govt exams, this exemplifies the evolving understanding of ocean-atmosphere carbon exchange, a key topic in climate change and environmental governance.
